Abstract. Languages are different from each other in terms of systems: phonetic, phonological, morphological, syntactic and semantic. This is due to the physical and the social environment in the Sapirian theory and to the parametric variations in Chomskian theory, where speakers use nouns and verbs, for instance, as heads or tails in sentences or the opposite.

Corpus Linguistics for Translation and Contrastive Studies provides a clear and practical introduction to using corpora in these fields. Giving special attention to parallel corpora, which are collections of texts in two or more languages, and demonstrating the potential benefits for multilingual corpus linguistics research to both translators and researchers, this book: explores the different types of parallel corpora available, and shows how to use basic and advanced search procedures to analyse them; explains how to compile a parallel corpus, and discusses their uses for translation purposes and to research linguistic phenomena across languages; demonstrates the use of corpus extracts across a wide range of texts, including dictionaries, novels by authors including Jane Austen and Mikhail Bulgakov, and newspapers such as The Sunday Times; is illustrated with case studies from a range of languages including Finnish, Russian, English and French. Written by two experienced researchers and practitioners, Corpus Linguistics for Translation and Contrastive Studies is essential reading for postgraduate students and researchers working within the area of translation and contrastive studies.

The papers in this volume provide a contrastive application of Construction Grammar. By referencing a well-described constructional phenomenon in English, each paper provides a solid foundation for describing and analyzing its constructional counterpart in another language. This approach shows that the semantic description (including discourse-pragmatic and functional factors) of an English construction can be regarded as a first step towards a "tertium comparationis" that can be employed for comparing and contrasting the formal properties of constructional counterparts in other languages. Thus, the meaning pole of constructions should be regarded as the primary basis for comparisons of constructions across languages - the form pole is only secondary. This volume shows that constructions are viable descriptive and analytical tools for cross-linguistic comparisons that make it possible to capture both language-specific (idiosyncratic) properties as well as cross-linguistic generalizations.

Abstract: Abstract of the thesis entitled "Demonstratives in Literary Translations: A Contrastive Study of English and Japanese" submitted by Chiu Ching Li, Lily for the degree of Master of Philosophy at the University of Hong Kong in August 1999 Japanese language has a three-step system for demonstratives whose initial syllable is expressed with ko, so, or a. By contrast, English has a two-step system for demonstratives, namely this and that. It is generally said that this corresponds to ko while that corresponds to so and a. To find out how and in what degree these direct translations happened in English-Japanese translations, the Japanese translations corresponding to the English demonstratives were examined. A descriptive study of the meanings and uses of each of the Japanese and English demonstratives as well as the English demonstrative adverbs here and there was first conducted. The similarities and differences between the English and Japanese demonstratives were clearly illustrated in a table. For analysis purpose, data were collected from three English novels, namely Jane Eyre, Pride and Prejudice, and The Good Earth, and their two different Japanese versions. From the data of each of the three novels, it was found that, among the different corresponding expressions, direct translation, without exception always occupies the majority. The focus of this thesis was on the analysis of data in which the factors accounting for the translation discrepancies were examined. It was found that psychological attributes and the notion of distance seem to be given different weight in the choice of demonstratives between the translators as well as between the translators and the authors. Moreover, the discrepancies in translations are mostly found in circumstances where either this or that can be used to indicate something which can only be indicated by a specific demonstrative in Japanese. The circumstances are concerned in attributes like negative image, hypothetical element, and shared and unshared knowledge. Other factors such as direct and indirect speech, and the practice of ellipsis are also accounted for the translation discrepancies. The analysis of translation discrepancies provided some implications for future translation work as well as for teaching of the demonstratives.
