Pride's Purge, 'the Rump' and regicide. After Charles I's surrender the Army and the Presbyterians spent many fruitless months trying to negotiate a settlement with him. At the same time he was encouraging uprisings in England and Wales and an invasion from Scotland. The Army repressed this series of royalist insurgencies in 1648 in the second Civil War, but afterwards its leaders demanded an end to negotiations with Charles, whom they considered a "man of blood" responsible for waging war ...

Pride's Purge, 'the Rump' and regicide - UK Parliament

Rump Parliament. In United Kingdom: Civil war and revolution. Pride ' s Purge was a last-minute compromise made to prevent absolute military rule. With Cromwell deliberately absent in the north, Ireton was left to stave off the argument, made by the Levelers, that Parliament was hopelessly corrupt and should be dissolved.

5.0 out of 5 stars Pride's Purge. Reviewed in the United Kingdom on March 28, 2010. Verified Purchase. This must be one of the all-time best books on the civil war/Cromwellian period. Not the easiest to read but packed with insight and detail. Possibly not a book for the casual reader, and it has no pictures, just solid academic well written text.

Pride's Purge, 1648. The purging of MPs of the Long Parliament hostile to the politicised New Model Army, carried out on 6 December 1648. The purging of Parliament was first proposed after the ending of the First Civil War in the manifesto known as the Representation of the Army. It was presented to Parliament in June 1647 at a time when Presbyterian MPs were attempting to disband the New Model Army without settlement of the soldiers' grievances.
