Walking the Rim. March 21, 2014. More fun at the big ditch. We shuttled around the east side of the park out to Yaki Point and then back to Pike Creek Vista where we got off the bus and walked back to Kaibab trail head. There are two trails down into the canyon, Kaibab in the east and Bright Angel in the west.

Indian Garden to the South Rim (5 miles): 2.75 hours; We also spent 30 minutes at Phantom Ranch and 30 minutes at Indian Garden, for a grand total of almost 11 hours. Our favorite section was at the very beginning of the hike. Walking down the North Kaibab Trail in the cool morning hours, along the crazy trail on the cliffs was so much fun.

In most spots, rim walks are relatively easy. Treks spontaneous or long can be crowded at times (especially sunset at specific points) but still offer ample opportunities for solitude and reflection. "It's awesome. I know that's not quite the right word, maybe 'speechless,'" Joe Farrey of Dayton, Ohio, said during a walk along the South Rim.

Walk the Grand Canyon's South Rim. Take in the beauty of the Grand Canyon at your own pace by walking the trail along the canyon rim. Some portions of it are paved, others are not. Some sections of the trail are part of a paved greenway, which is great if you want to bike as well. One section of the trail, beginning at Yavapai Point, is designated the Trail of Time and features markers and exhibits designed to give you a sense of perspective about the canyon's formation, geology and history.

The easiest is the Rim Trail, a relatively flat walk that meanders along the rim taking in many different lookouts. However, the truly special ones are those that go below the rim which can be tackled with a stay at the bottom of the canyon (either at Phantom Ranch or camping - both require advanced reservation) or in part on a day hike.
