Separation and contrast are some of Lahiri's principal thematic threads in "When Mr. Pirzada Came to Dine." First, the difference between the ways adults and children perceive the world receives major emphasis in the story. The narrator Lilia, 10 years old, cannot understand why Mr. Pirzada "is no longer considered Indian," as her father remarks. After all, he is Bengali, and he shares the same sense of humor, the same food, and many of the same customs with her family.

A blackout forces a young Indian American couple to make confessions that unravel their tattered domestic peace. An Indian American girl recognizes her cultural identity during a Halloween celebration while the Pakistani civil war rages on television in the background. At the heart of it is their eldest son, Michael, a brilliant, anxious music fanatic who makes sense of the world through parody. Over the span of decades, his younger siblings -- the savvy and responsible Celia and the ambitious and tightly controlled Alec -- struggle along with their mother to care for Michael's increasingly troubled and precarious existence. Told in alternating points of view by all five members of the family, this searing, gut-wrenching, and yet frequently hilarious novel brings alive with remarkable depth and poignancy the love of a mother for her children, the often inescapable devotion siblings feel toward one another, and the legacy of a father's pain in the life of a family. “In twenty-nine separate but ingenious ways, these stories seek permanent residence within a reader. They strive to become an emotional or intellectual cargo that might accompany us wherever, or however, we go. . . . If we are made by what we read, if language truly builds people into what they are, how they think, the depth with which they feel, then these stories are, to me, premium material for that construction project. You could build a civilization with them.” —Ben Marcus, from the Introduction Award-winning author of Notable American Women

This thesis examines how a history of racialization in the United States impacts the identity formation of the South Asian American characters in Jhumpa Lahiri's Interpreter of Maladies. It also includes an examination of the ways in which South Asian Americans are often inaccurately labeled as 'foreign' and 'other' in relation to white Americans and the ways in which race often functions as an ineffective signifier of group homogeneity. To date relatively little has been written about race in South Asian American fiction, and in examining how racialization affects the South Asian Americans in Lahiri's stories I hope to contribute another element to the study of identity formation in South Asian American literature. In particular, this thesis focuses on the effects of racialization in three of the ten stories from Interpreter of Maladies: "When Mr. Pirzada Came to Dine," "Interpreter of Maladies," and "Sexy,"--Because they encompass a variety of relationships and points of view. Part I of this thesis serves as an introduction to the history of South Asian Americans and of the emergence of "Asian America," while Part II is an analysis of the three aforementioned short stories from Lahiri's collection. While in each short story varying misperceptions of race are shown to affect South Asian American identity, an analysis of the stories shows that these misperceptions can be traced to the racialized history of South Asian Americans in the United States and the ambiguity that has resulted from trying to categorize individuals on the basis of race and ethnicity.

Essay from the year 2007 in the subject American Studies - Comparative Literature, grade: B, language: English, comment: Some quotations in German, abstract: The short stories in Brooklyn author Jhumpa Lahiri's anthology Interpreter of Maladies all share a plotline revolving around immigration, conforming to a typical theme in the contemporary American short story. In this context, food is used as a means to express the crossing of boundaries, whether they are political, religious or psychological. Rituals, beliefs, customs and morals attached to the preparation, consumption and celebration of meals by characters in the stories depict the negotiation of a hyphenated identity as it pertains to gender, sexuality, family, friendship, war and love. Lahiri's stories tell the reader about the Indian - American experience in particular, but her narratives transcend national concerns, because the food archetype is universal. In her fictional accounts, Lahiri works out her characters' efforts to maintain their Indian tradition while struggling to assimilate to the United States and the ambivalence that is involved in the process. This is achieved by a literal feed into socio-cultural gaps creating a great deal of irony and humor. Lahiri appeals to the reader's senses through the detailed description of taste, smell, visual or texture of food and the atmosphere surrounding it. A vivid idea of a component of the characters' heritage is evoked as a result in the reader, so he / she develops a concrete awareness for certain culturally based idiosyncracies and differences likely to clash with American mores.

The stories of Unaccustomed Earth focus on second-generation immigrants making and remaking lives, loves and identities in England and America. We follow brothers and sisters, mothers and fathers, friends and lovers, in stories that take us from Boston and London to Bombay and Calcutta. Blending the individual and the generational, the exotic and the strikingly mundane, these haunting, exquisitely detailed and emotionally complex stories are intensely compelling elegies of life, death, love and fate. This is a dazzling work from a masterful writer.
