In 1899, the conflict between the British and the Boers burgeoned into a full-fledged war that was fought in three stages: a Boer offensive against British command posts and railway lines, a British counteroffensive that brought the two republics under British control, and a Boer guerrilla resistance movement that prompted a widespread scorched-earth campaign by the British and the internment and deaths of thousands of Boer civilians in British concentration camps.

The Boer War in South Africa (1899-1902)

The British lost 5774 soldiers in combat (1.3%), the Boers lost 3990 (8.7%). The main losses for the British were from disease, about 14,000; usually dysentery from drinking river water. Interesting that armies in those days (only just over 100 years ago). Didn ' t employ basic hygiene standards and allowed such losses.

Why did the British lose so many men in the Boer Wars ...

Though at first accepting of the new colonial administration, the Boers soon grew disgruntled with the liberal policies of the British, especially in regard to the frontier and the freeing of slaves. Between 1835 and 1843 about 12,000 Boers left the Cape in the Great Trek, heading for the relatively rural spaces of the high veld and southern Natal. In 1852 the British government agreed to recognize the independence of the settlers in the Transvaal (later the South African Republic) and in ...
